

Germany extends life of nuclear power stations

The German government's extension to the average 32-year lifespan of the country's nuclear power stations means they could operate for up to 46 years from their start-up dates. The four big nuclear operators will be required to pay a fuel tax of billions of euros to boost renewable energy

