

Protection urged for tiger breeding grounds

Efforts to rescue the tiger from the brink of extinction should focus on protecting populations of the big cat in a few concentrated breeding sites, scientists have urged. According to conservationists, only about 3,500 tigers remain in the wild, less than one third of them breeding females

