

Referendum could split Africa's largest nation

Southern Sudanese voters have begun registering for the independence referendum which could see the country divided in two, despite fears that disputes over key resources could revive the bloody conflict that ended in 2005. President al-Bashir has promised to abide by the results

