

Ancient tools point to last Neanderthal refuge

The discovery in Russia of a primitive human toolkit – believed to be about 33,000 years old but resembling much earlier technology – could indicate that Neanderthals coexisted with more modern humans for a longer period of time than previously thought

